Hamburgh, April 5th, 1799.

According to the moſt recent Accounts from the Auſtrian Army it appears, that after the Action of the 21ſt Ultimo, General Jourdan retreated in the Night, between the 21ſt and 22d, to Stockach and Engen. He then occupied the Line from Shaffouſen through Engen to Dutlingen; in the Neighbourhood of which laſt Place, he aſſembled the principal Part of his Army. The Archduke advanced towards him on the 25th, when General Jourdan attacked the Auſtrians. His Left Wing was at firſt ſucceſsful; but his Centre and Right having been defeated, he was obliged to retreat with his whole Army in great Diſorder; his Right Wing towards Switzerland, and he himself, with the Remainder of his Army, towards Fribourg and Offenbourg, by the Black Forest.

Whilst this was passing in Suabia, General Massena in Person attacked, on the 23d, the Position of Feldkirk, where General Jellachich commanded in the Absence of General Hotzé. The French were repulsed with very great Loss, and driven over the Rhine. General Hotzé is since returned to Feldkirk from Buckhorn, with the Corps of Twelve Thousand Men, which he had marched to that Place, the French having retreated from thence in consequence of the Archduke's Victory of the 21st.

The Loss on both Sides in these different Actions, which appear to have been hard fought, has been very considerable, but much greater on the Part of the French than on that of the Austrians, who have, however, lost several Officers of Distinction. On the 21st, the French are stated to have lost Four Thousand Men—on the 23d, Three Thousand—and on the 25th, their Loss is stated to have been much more considerable than on either of the preceding Days.

On the 26th, the Archduke marched in pursuit of the Enemy.
